She doesn't really need to talk too much about Sandra, she has entered the big door of public business not only online but also as a person who has not agreed to compromises, so her whole work is based on rebellion. Some men say it addresses too many "women" topics. Some women say she's on the "men's" side. Certainly, everyone who understands her knows that her topics are actually against divisions.

Of any kind.

Crnjanski and London, Panel discussion

The British Library in partnership with the Serbian Council of Great Britain
British Library, Knowledge Centre, 96 Euston Road London NW1 2DB

This event is part of 'The South Slavs and Britain' a project initiated by The British Library. Christina Pribicevic-Zoric & Will Firth, translators from Serbo-Croatian; Dr David Norris, specialist in Serbian literary and cultural studies; Vesna Stanojevic, actress and senior lecturer in acting.

Miloš Crnjanski (1893-1977) was a Serbian writer who lived as an exile in London from 1941 to 1965. But what do we know of his life there and why did he spend so many years in London? How does London figure in his work 'A Novel of London'? Why are the themes of identity and migration relevant today? What are the challenges in translating Crnjanski and specifically his 'Novel of London'? What was his contribution to Serbian literature?
